Accident Prevention, like other professions, uses various devices to achieve its objective.

One of the most important aids, Accident Records, indicates problems needing to be solved. The usefulness of these records depends upon their accuracy and completeness. Supervisors must fully complete all accident reports, supplying all relevant details.

Every employee should report all minor as well as major accidents; remember that very often the only difference between these is the degree of injury. If we can correct the cause of minor accidents we will go a long way in eradicating major ones.
